After only a few months this was effected. The previous solitude was replaced by an eager crowd, and people flocked in from-all sides. This was the moment which John had eagerly waited for. He had gained the first point: the next and the most important was to maintain this interest, and so earnestly did he labour at all that tended to the common edification, and so attractive did he make both the services and the sermons, that month by month, and year by year, the church was thronged with a devout and earnest congregation, while the veneration to the miraculous picture daily increased. Great as were his goodness and gentleness towards his penitents and towards all good Christians, he yet could be stern and severe in reproving vice, as the following incident will show. In the height of summer,...
