Aldrich s uncle was a commission merchant, and Aldrich would be sometimes in the counting room and sometimes down on the wharves to oversee the shipping of the goods; but his uncle suspected that he was more interested in writing verses than he was in the commission business. It has become part of the history of Aldrich s Ballad of Babie Bell that he wrote it on the backs of bills of lading down on the wharf while he was checking up items of goods consigned to his uncle s firm. Babie Bell was copied into one paper or magazine after another, all over the country; and there is a pretty story of how its recitation stopped the quarreling of some half-drunken miners in a low tavern in the West. When Aldrich was invited to review books...
