Apart from the statute the removal would have been a trespass. Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad coelum. 2 Bl. Com. 18. A limited power of entry upon land on which no building had yet been erected was given by the Act of 24th February, 1721 (1 Sm. L. 125; Purd. U24, pi. 7), in which, however, it is expressly provided that the cost should be proportionally borne by the second builder so soon as he needed the new wall. The intent of the Act of 1857 being perfectly clear, according to the natural and grammatical construction of the language used, its words may not be disregarded in seeking to ascertain some other supposed intent. If the view taken by the Court below of the Act of 185 be correct, the provision of 1721, as to the cost of erection, might have been re-enacted without the change of a word; but, as different language has been used, it follows that the legislature intended to establish a different rule. This manifest difference in the wording of the two Acts should not be lost sight of in their interpretation. Bentham's Rationale of Judicial Evidence, V. 170, cap. 25. Potters 1) warris on Statutes, 199. Geiidell, with whom was E. S. Miller, contra. If the appellant is right in his position, by his delay in building he will get for nothing a new, strong wall, built much more on the land of his neighbor than upon...
